

Korea: It's All Our Fault

At least that's what North Korea would like the world to believe. Here is what Korea Central News Agency had to say earlier today Korea time (<http://www.kcna.co.jp/index-e.htm>).

The U.S. is entirely to blame for the alarming developments on the peninsula this year as it used the peninsula for realizing its strategy to dominate East Asia.

The U.S. focused its efforts on knocking into shape a triangular military alliance grouping the U.S., Japan, and south Korea to hold hegemony in the Asia-Pacific.

The U.S. orchestrated the "Cheonan" sinking case and the Yonphyong Island conflict and used them as a golden opportunity for stepping up the formation of the alliance.

The U.S., Japan and south Korea demonstrated unprecedented joint actions in reacting to the warship case and island shelling incident. They employed every means and method to add fuel to fire, escalating the conflict.

Analysis. This article would be comic relief for the current situation in Korea if the North wasn't serious about this interpretation of events. If they believe they are under siege it is because they are. But there is a solution. North Korea can start behaving like a rational nation.

The ugly truth is that there is no happy ending here. We can postpone the day of reckoning as the PRC would like; or we can get the war over with and perhaps put an end to the pain of the North Korean people. But postponing the end of the DPRK merely increases the suffering of the people of North Korea. This is a war now or war later situation and has been since 1953.
